

A grayscale photograph of a person wearing a face mask, sitting at a desk and working on a computer. The person is in profile, facing right. The background is dark and out of focus, showing what appears to be office equipment and shelves. The overall mood is professional and focused.

Pinkerton Contact Tracing

Overview

Contact tracing is an effective tool to contain the spread of infectious disease. It has been used in the fight against Ebola, SARS, and other infections. It works to curtail transmission by quickly identifying and notifying those who have been exposed to an individual who has tested positive, through the work of a Contact Tracer. These contacts are then cared for according to the quarantine or isolation requirements in each jurisdiction.

As the COVID-19 pandemic develops, localized lockdowns, changing restrictions, and quarantine requirements on travelers and at-risk populations will impact organizations -- including their employees and customers in which they operate.

In this changing risk environment, enterprise-wide contact tracing is available to organizations who need to:

- Meet their duty of care responsibilities by limiting the spread of COVID-19 through the workforce
- Ensure business continuity by anticipating which individuals or teams are at higher risk once a case is confirmed
- Enhance readiness by building a flexible, scalable contact tracing unit in anticipation of further waves of the pandemic

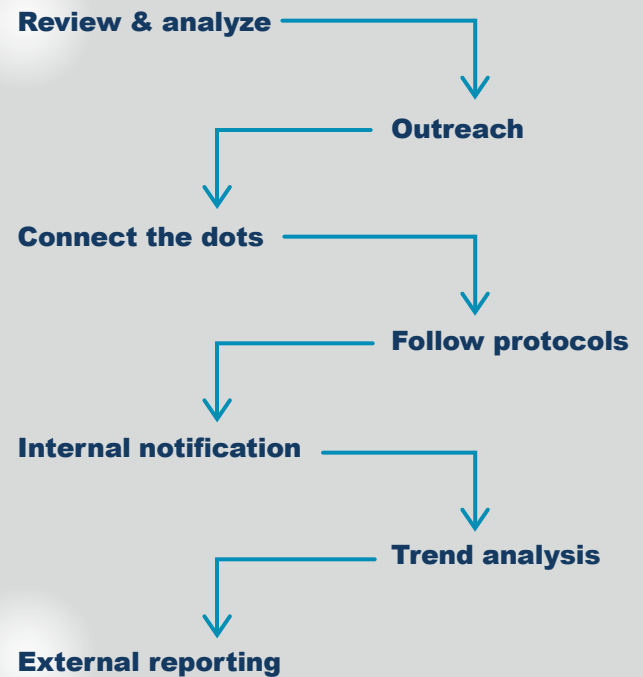

Tailored, Agile and Scalable Solution

Pinkerton's Enterprise Contact Tracing solution combines our investigations, intelligence and advisory capabilities:

- Embed a dedicated, global contact tracing team through our Pinkerton Dedicated Professional program, available 24/7 to track and identify cases and contacts
- Tailor our training and support processes to include all the stages of the contact tracing process – including the soft skills required to effectively engage your workforce with empathy
- Provide access to our existing intelligence infrastructure, network, and global resources
- Align and integrate with your HR, workplace safety, and return to work programs
- A close partnership through a local to global account management framework

How it works

Compliant with client policies & procedures, with a strong focus on professionalism and empathy, and adhering to local laws and regulations:

Comprehensive Risk Management

Pinkerton has helped organizations navigate complex crisis for 170+ years as a trusted partner of Fortune 500 companies and numerous leading organizations around the globe. We harness innovative tech and draw on our knowledge to identify, forecast, and mitigate your total risk.

